The NFA's focus on risk reduction, disaster preparedness, and management strategies helps states respond more effectively to large-scale emergencies.

NFA training is provided to attendees from all 50 states.

NFA training is both in-person and online. Both forms of training are critical for optimal preparedness.

Over my career in the fire service, I have been able to attend several on campus courses at the NFA. The knowledge and skills learned there are immeasurable in what they have meant to the development of my career.

Information I have learned from the instructors at the NFA has been some of the most valuable information. The networking that you get from attending NFA is the best. Because of the networking I have been able to reach out to different hazmat teams across the country to assist with information. The loss of these extremely valuable resources is a step backwards for the fire service.
